This image from the Hubble Space Telescope is an example of ‘painting with light’. Astronomers use the separated colours produced by oxygen and hydrogen to investigate star-forming processes in the Ghost Head Nebula. The colours explain much about the nature of such nebulae.